

HENRY GREENEBAUM'S INFORMATION.

Guy Magee, of THE TRIBUNE, was called and testified:

"I saw Mr. Weber the day of the shooting. I first saw the lady in Griffen's office; was present at the examination. She had her left arm and hand concealed under a large cloak, and was perpetually moving it backwards and forwards, as if she was feeling for the safety of money or something valuable. I didn't hear her say anything about Weber. I walked with her from Griffen's office almost as far as the corner of Washington and LaSalle. I asked her if she had threatened, or tried, to kill Weber the day before. She merely laughed, and asked me who told me so. I said Greenebaum had told me that she had threatened to shoot him (Weber), and then she laughed again, and said she had neither threatened nor tried to shoot him. I asked her if she carried a pistol, and she said no, and I didn't see her have one. I wasn't present when the shooting took place. Thursday afternoon about 2 o'clock Greenebaum came up into the city editor's room in THE TRIBUNE Building, where I was sitting alone, and asked me if I wanted a good piece of news for next day's paper. I said yes. He then told me they were taking testimony in the Weber case over at Griffen's office, No. 37 Bryan Block, and said it would be pretty rich and racy. He then said that the day previous Mrs. Robert had tried to shoot Weber. Greenebaum also said, in another connection, that Weber had sworn to a pack of lies in the book he had published,—the pamphlet."

"Did you understand or infer," asked Mr. Huck, one of the jurors, "from Mr. Greenebaum's remarks, that he came there for the special purpose of telling you that this case was pending, and to give you the news about the shooting to publish?"

"My inference was that he would be very much gratified to have the thing written up and published."

"Did you infer that he had come there for that very purpose? Had he any other business in your office?"

"He had not—at least not with me—at that time."
